BURNHAM WANTED
CAMP WALLACE FIELD

D. H. Burnham, the architect who designed most of the buildings for the St. Louis Exposition, and who passed through here a few months ago en route to Manila, where he was to submit a plan for the building of a model official city near Manila—a Philippine Simla—was a through passenger on the Sibiria yesterday en route to the mainland. He was accompanied by Mr. Will Anderson, the young Utah architect, who won first prize in competition in Paris a few years ago. Mr. Burnham was joined here by Mrs. Burnham and Miss Burnham, who have been guests at the Moana Hotel for several weeks, all departing together for the mainland yesterday afternoon.

There has been a rub at Manila between the Philippine Commission and the military authorities over Camp Wallace field. The Commission did not wish to give the military a vested right in Camp Wallace field for drills and military maneuvers, and the military authorities don't want the field all the time—only occasionally.

Architect Burnham had a tentative scheme for using the field for the erection of new government buildings. He desired to have a capitol building, when the revenues of the internal revenue law will permit, buildings in which may be housed the heads of bureaus and their staffs and surrounding all with a park and recreation ground that will make Central Park in New York look like the proverbial thirty cents.

To carry out this plan would leave little or no room for military maneuvers. The architect's scheme for the beautification of the city was seriously disarranged by this desire of the military authorities.

Mr. Burnham may return to Manila again this summer.

ASHMEAD
BARTLETT*War Correspondent's
Opinion of Stoessel.

Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, son of Ashmead-Bartlett of the British Parliament, and step-son of the famous Baroness Burdett-Coutts, was a through passenger on the Sibiria yesterday en route from the Far East to London. Mr. Bartlett has been representing the London Times with the Japanese investing army before Port Arthur, and entered the fallen city with the victors on January 12.

"General Stoessel can only be ranked as a second-rate defender of a great fortress," said Mr. Bartlett yesterday aboard the Sibiria. "He should have held out at least three months longer, but he came to the dividing line between humanity and military glory, and gave in. The surrender was somewhat of a surprise, for it was believed that Stoessel would hold on like grim death to the last ditch."

"There has never been a siege like that at Port Arthur since that at Sebastopol. It was a great defense as far as it went, but Russia loses the glory of it by Stoessel's early surrender. My opinion is that instead of attaining a first place in military annals as a commander of a besieged fortress, Stoessel must be content with a second place."

"Stoessel was far from being the moving spirit in the defense of Port Arthur. Russians admit that Kondrechenko, the engineer who fortified Port Arthur, was the mainspring of the defense, and that when he was killed the troops lost heart. Even these officers," pointing to a group of Russian naval officers from the broken Port Arthur fleet who are through passengers on the Sibiria, "say that Kondrechenko's death was the turning point in the defense."

"As to the investing army, I do not believe soldiers could be more brave. The Japanese have shown themselves wonderful fighters, and in the long siege of Port Arthur, with the deadly assaults, where thousands and thousands were slaughtered, they showed their militarism to the highest degree."

"The Russians, I feel certain, had four months' provisions when they surrendered. When I entered Port Arthur the effect of the bombardment was shown in the old town. It was ripped to pieces in places. The warships were all sunk in the harbor. From what I learned there most of them were sunk by shells. These Russian officers have admitted this to me."

MRS. MARY AILAU PASSES AWAY ON ISLAND OF HAWAII

Descended From a Line of Princes and Highly Connected Also in Massachusetts—Her Interesting Personal History.

Mrs. Mary Ann Kaaumokulani Kinoo Pitman Ailau died at Hilo on February 11, and was buried there on Sunday. Mrs. Ailau was one of the best known women in the islands, having come from a long line of high chiefs and chiefesses of the island of Hawaii.

She was born at Hilo 67 years ago, and with the exception of a number of years spent in Boston completing her education, she always resided in the islands. She was a daughter of Benjamin Pitman, a capitalist, who resided both in Hilo and Honolulu. The Pitman home was at the corner of Alakea and Beretania streets, on the site now occupied by the C. Q. Yee Hop building.

The Pitmans came here from Boston, where they were well connected. Mrs. Ailau's father-in-law also resided here for a number of years. Her father married the High Chiefess Kinoo, daughter of the High Chief Hoolulu.

Hoolulu achieved fame as one of the two men who concealed the bones of Kamehameha the Great in a cave, which has never been disclosed to this day, the secret dying with both men. The body of Kamehameha the Great was originally buried at Kamakahonu, Kailua, Hawaii, the grave itself being known as Ahuena. When the bones were removed from there, they lay in state, with chiefs waving kahilis over them. When many had fallen asleep, Hoolulu and his half-brother, Prince Hoopili, crept forward, took away the bones, which were wrapped in an abula, and carried them away in a canoe. It is generally believed that the two men went to the North Kona coast, and that Hoolulu dived to a submarine cave, the location being known only to himself and Hoopili, and placed the royal bones therein. There has been a common belief also that the bones were hid in a cave in the face of the Pali Kapukou, the picturesque bluff which overhangs Kealahou Bay, where Captain Cook was killed.

Hoolulu was also a chief, who had control of the whole of the Hilo district from the mountains to the sea, and his two daughters, Kinoo and Kahimu, were called the Princesses of Hilo. When Benjamin Pitman married Kinoo, the Kamehameha of that time gave the husband the control of the Hilo district.

Hoolulu's father was Kameelamoku, one of the tabu twin princes, whose effigies are seen in the Hawaiian coat-of-arms.

Mrs. Ailau was educated both in Hilo and Honolulu under private teachers, and completed her education in Boston, where her father took his family after the death of Kinoo.

She leaves one brother, Benjamin Pitman, a prominent business man of Boston, and a member of the firm of L. P. Hollander & Co., having married the daughter of Mr. Hollander. Another brother, Henry, became a captain of cavalry during the War of the Rebellion in the United States. He was taken prisoner by the rebels and confined in Libby Prison, where his health broke down. Upon his release he failed rapidly and died.

Mrs. Ailau was one of the bridesmaids of Queen Emma at the time of her marriage to Kamehameha IV, on June 19, 1856.

"Admiral" George Beekley was the first cousin of the deceased, and Hon. F. W. Beekley, Speaker of the House in the last Legislature, was her second cousin.
